

THE PLAYER'S GUIDE

The King's Crusade

BEFORE YOU BEGIN

This is what your character would know before ever meeting the rest of the party: the shape of the war, the realm you came from, and the reasons a person might have for answering a king's summons to march somewhere they have never been. It is not everything. Elduvaine has been closed to outsiders for three years, and most of what is said about it now is secondhand, half-remembered, or simply wrong — treat every claim below that isn't plainly stated fact as exactly that: a claim, not a promise of what you will find.

Build your character against the world as described here. Let your DM fill in the rest at the table, as your character actually learns it.

THE CALL

Three years ago, the roads out of Elduvaine stopped keeping their old habits, and then stopped carrying anything at all. What little came out after that arrived on foot, thin, and reluctant to talk about what it had seen. The story that eventually settled was this: Elduvaine did not fall to an invasion. It fell to one of its own — a man named Maedoc Vale, who had spent nineteen years as Keeper of the great Archive at Caer Ysolde, and who one night opened every ward he had sworn to maintain and let an army walk in through the gap. Nobody who tells this story claims to know why he did it. He has not explained himself to anyone still able to ask.

The royal house is taken, or scattered, or in hiding — accounts differ, and the truth is likely all three at once. The land itself, which in Elduvaine has never been ordinary, is reportedly failing in patches, the way a body fails when something is being taken from it faster than it can be replaced.

King Xavier III of Harrowmark has called a crusade, and — unusually for a king — is leading it himself. Two other powers march under the same call: the Kingdom of Oksitan and the Grand Duchy of Auberitz, each for reasons of their own that they have been perfectly willing to state and perfectly unwilling to fully explain. A third, the Kingdom of Norvatch, has taken no side and made no promises, and deals with whoever is useful to it.

You are not part of the army. You are what a king sends ahead of one: four to six people who can move faster than a column of thousands, go where it cannot, and be denied more plausibly if caught somewhere they should not be. Xavier chose this party himself, and remembers names.

The march to Elduvaine is long, and your DM is not rushing you through it. Expect the road itself — the realms you cross, the people you meet on the way, the ordinary difficulty of moving anywhere with an army behind you — to be as much a part of this campaign as anything you eventually find at the other end of it.

WHERE YOU'RE FROM: HARROWMARK

Assuming you are — plenty of the party will not be, and the next section covers the rest. But Harrowmark is the crusade's spine and the king's own country, and it is worth knowing whether you came from it or merely arrived in it.

Harrowmark is cold, stony, and has never once been called marvellous by anyone who has actually been there. Grey stone under a greyer sky, hard winters, hill forts, and a people who take a great deal of convincing before they will call anything remarkable.

Elduvish scholars have a habit of calling Harrowmark "unmagical," which is a convenient phrase and not an accurate one. Harrowmark has wizards. It has priests whose prayers are answered, hedge-witches along the coast, war-mages in the king's own pay, and a cold, well-regarded college that has taught evocation for two centuries. Magic in Harrowmark works exactly as it works everywhere else in the world outside Elduvaine: it is studied, cast, carried by a person, and spent. A character from Harrowmark can be any spellcaster in the game, and should never be told they can't.

What Harrowmark genuinely lacks is a land that participates. Its roads are exactly as long as they look. Its rivers hold nothing that is said to them. Its stone is dark once the sun goes down, and always has been. This is simply a fact about the place, not a flaw in it — and it is worth remembering the first time something in Elduvaine behaves otherwise.

What Harrowmark has instead of wonder is wyverns. They nest in the high crags and always have, and dealing with them is not an adventure so much as a season of the working year, handled with long pikes, longer ropes, and losses the rest of the world finds alarming and Harrowmark finds ordinary. This produces a particular kind of person: not fearless, exactly, but hard to impress. Something enormous with wings overhead is a problem your grandmother already solved once. Whatever else your character carries out of Harrowmark, they carry that.

THE PEOPLES OF THE CRUSADE

No kingdom in this war belongs to one people. Every realm below is mixed, and what tells them apart is not who lives there but what that place has made of them — its trades, its institutions, and the things it asks its people to be good at. Play whatever you like from wherever you like; all of it fits.

The clearest illustration is the dwarves. In Harrowmark they are crag-hold folk who hunt wyverns with long pikes and a great deal of rope, and are famous for it. In Norvatch they are factors and contract-lawyers whose written word is the most trusted instrument in the trading world. Same people, two countries, and a Harrowmark dwarf meeting a Norvatch dwarf will find they have markedly less in common than either has with the neighbours they grew up beside. Both will tell you so at length if you give them the opening.

Where you might be from	Who you would have grown up among
Harrowmark	Humans farming thin soil behind hill-fort walls, dwarves in the crag holds, and orcs in the high country for as many generations as anyone has counted. Half-orcs and half-elves throughout, unremarked — Harrowmark does not have the energy to remark on things. Every caster here is a trained professional, because the land itself does nothing.
Kingdom of Oksitan	River country and horse country. Humans in the main, with an old landed nobility that is substantially dragonborn — houses that have held the same fords since before anyone wrote it down. Half-elves common at court and commoner in its diplomacy.
Grand Duchy of Auberitz	The duchy that builds things: humans, gnomes and halflings, mercantile and engineering rather than martial, and privately of the view that this whole war is a logistics problem being mishandled by people who enjoy shouting.
Kingdom of Norvatch	Guild-law country — dwarves and tieflings, humans throughout — where a bargain is written, witnessed, filed and binding, and where the realm's entire standing rests on honouring the letter of one no matter what the letter turns out to have meant.
Elduvaine	You would not be marching, but a character from the occupied kingdom is entirely playable. Elves, whose orchards hold the season they were planted in; gnomes, who keep the ledgers and cut the light-stone; halflings in the river parishes; humans throughout. If you are from here, you have been in exile or hiding for three years.

What your character does not know, and cannot, is what Elduvaine looks like now. Everyone above has heard it is bad.

the party may just as easily hail from Oksitan, Auberitz, or even Norvatch, arriving at the muster by their own road rather than Harrowmark's. The table below is what any of them would already know about the others.

WHO MARCHES WITH YOU

A character need not come from Harrowmark — Xavier's call reached every realm marching under it, and a member of

Realm	Role in the War
Harrowmark	Xavier III's own kingdom, and the crusade's spine. Cold, unmagical-in-the-land, and marching under its own king in person.
Kingdom of Oksitan	An allied power under the call, marching for reasons of its own that its own court has not fully explained to anyone outside it.
Grand Duchy of Auberitz	The second allied power, likewise under the call and likewise not marching purely out of sympathy for Elduvaine.
Kingdom of Norvatch	Has taken no side. Trades with, and has some understanding with, whoever currently holds Elduvaine — and will deal with the coalition just as readily, for a price. Keeps whatever bargains it makes.

None of the three visiting powers is marching purely for Elduvaine's sake, and none of them pretends otherwise to anyone who asks directly. What each of them actually wants out of a won war is not something your character would know yet — only that they all, plainly, want something.

offered to those who answer the call are simple to state and enormous in practice: a share of Elduvaine's own magic — land inside the Living Realm itself, where the old habits are said to work — and access to the Ysolde Archive, reputed to be the largest single collection of magical knowledge anywhere in the world.

THE PROMISE

A crusade this size is not raised on sympathy alone, and Xavier did not ask anyone to march for nothing. The terms

Both promises depend on one thing neither Xavier nor anyone else can currently guarantee: that Elduvaine is actually taken, and actually held, by the time the war ends. Your character may be marching for the promise itself, for reasons that have nothing to do with it, or for some mixture the player hasn't fully worked out yet — all three are equally valid places to start.

ELDUVAINE, AS IT'S TOLD

Almost nothing below comes from a firsthand source. Elduvaine has been closed for three years, and what travels out of a closed country is rumor, old memory, and the occasional survivor's account, filtered through however many tellings it took to reach a Harrowmark tavern. Treat it as the stories your character grew up hearing, not as a briefing.

The stories agree on one strange thing: in Elduvaine, magic is said to live in the land itself rather than being worked by a person. Nobody outside Elduvaine has ever fully explained what that means, and the accounts that follow are the closest anyone has come.

What's Said	As the Stories Tell It
The Willing Road	A road that shortens for a traveller who means well by whoever waits at the end of it. No one has ever agreed on what, exactly, the road is measuring.
The Listening Water	Rivers and standing pools said to keep speech spoken at their edge, and give it back later in the speaker's own voice.
The Kept Season	A wood that holds the season it was planted in, permanently, regardless of the calendar around it.
The Standing Light	Worked stone that holds daylight poured into it, so that Elduvish cities are said to need no lamps at night.

More recent accounts — from the handful of people who have actually come out since the wards opened — say some of this is failing. Roads that no longer shorten. Rivers that answer with voices nobody recognizes, or don't answer at all. Whether that's true, and what it would mean if it is, your character will have to find out for themselves.

RUMORS FROM THE ROAD

What follows is exactly what it sounds like — things travelers, refugees, and secondhand sources say. Some of it is certainly true. Some of it is certainly not. Nobody your character has ever met can tell them reliably which is which, and that includes their own party.

- “There’s a stretch of the old west road where nothing works right anymore — not good, not bad, just nothing. A mile of ordinary dirt, in a country where dirt was never ordinary before.”
- “A river between two market towns forgot eleven years of what was said to it. The towns started writing things down instead. They’re bad at it.”
- “There’s a wood that used to hold spring forever. Somebody who got out says it’s winter there now, and getting colder every season, which shouldn’t be possible for a wood like that at all.”
- “The man who took the kingdom was one of their own — kept the Archive for nineteen years, and everyone trusted him. Nobody agrees on why he turned. Nobody who’d actually know is talking.”
- “Caer Ysolde used to glow at night, they say — stone full of stored daylight, so the city never needed a lamp. Somebody who saw it recently says it’s properly dark now, for the first time anyone can remember.”
- “They’ve got things living in the hedges over there. Little ones, with opinions. A man I trust swears blind his cousin argued with one about an apple and lost.”
- “Norvatch never took the call, and Norvatch is doing very well out of a war it isn’t in. Draw whatever conclusion you like; they’ll sell you the rope either way, and they’ll deliver on time.”

BUILDING YOUR CHARACTER

This campaign runs on the 2014 edition of the fifth-edition rules (SRD 5.1). Characters begin at 5th level — Extra Attack and 3rd-level spells are already available from the first session, because Xavier did not choose raw recruits, he chose champions. Advancement is by milestone rather than by tallying experience: the party levels up when the story reaches a point that has earned it, not when a spreadsheet says so. The table expects four to six players, and every class, race, and background in the game is available — including full spellcasters from Harrowmark, whatever its reputation among the Elduvish.

On race specifically: pick whatever you want to play, then decide which of the realms above raised you. Those are separate questions in this setting and answering them separately will give you a better character than answering them together. An orc from Harrowmark and an orc from anywhere else have almost nothing in common; the interesting part of your character is the country, not the species.

WHY WERE YOU CHOSEN?

Xavier picked this party in person, which means he had a reason for each of you, even if that reason was never fully explained. Some possibilities, freely mixed or discarded:

- You did something in Harrowmark’s service — killed a wyvern nobody else would go near, held a hill fort, solved a problem quietly enough that only the king heard about it.
- You came recommended by someone Xavier trusts, and have never quite worked out whether that recommendation was earned or simply convenient.
- You are from one of the allied realms and were attached to this party for reasons your own court explained to you only partially.

- You have a stake in Elduvaine itself — a half-remembered family story, an old debt, a promise made to someone who never came back from there — that has nothing to do with the Promise and everything to do with why you said yes.
- You simply wanted to see a place people say is strange in ways nowhere else is, before whatever is happening to it finishes happening.

You do not need to have this fully decided before the first session. Some of the best answers arrive during play, once your character has actually seen the road.

SONGS OF THE MUSTER

Every column marches to something. Harrowmark's troops, and by now most of the coalition's, have taken up a single verse said to date back to the muster at Duncarrow itself — sung, murmured, or simply thought at the end of a hard day, and by soldiers who could not tell you who wrote it first.

*By thought, and by word, and by deed,
the king's own chosen kept their creed.
Far from home, where the quiet land lay,
they held the line, and would not stray.*

Your DM may close a session with it. If they do, it is worth listening to properly — it is the same four lines every time, and that is exactly the point of it.

WHAT YOU CARRY

You are leaving a cold, ordinary, thoroughly explicable kingdom to march toward one that, by every account, is neither cold nor ordinary nor explicable — and that is currently being taken apart by a man nobody can adequately explain either. The road between the two is long enough that you will be a different person by the time you reach the end of it. That is not a warning. It is the whole point of going.
